Suzy and Georges Bidault lunched with us today at Versailles. They were both in great conversational form and Georges, as always, full of humor. I talked to him a good bit about the various European schemes for integration and he is relatively optimistic.

Tonight we left for Luxembourg and arrived at the Hotel Chateau de Beggen about midnight. It is a [redacted] nice place on the edge of the city, built by one of the big Nineteenth Century steel magnates and now a hotel, with about eight bedrooms, run by a Belgian baroness. The architecture and the furnishings are pretty ghastly but the establishment itself is comfortable.
